

SURPRISING TAKE OF WHALES.

Dublin, July 1

An amazing number of whales have been taken on the coast of the county of Wexford. On Sunday last, a large shoal of them appeared near Ragenbon-head, and in the bay of Fethard, and several unsuccessful attempts were made to shoot some of them. They continued sporting to and fro till Wednesday evening, when, about five o'clock, in the midst of a calm, and without any apparent cause, no fewer than fifty-three of them made in a body for the strand at Fethard, where they grounded, and were left by the tide. The people in the neighbourhood lost no time in availing themselves of the fortunate circumstance, and in a short time, the hapless strangers were mere skeletons, the strand and sea, to a considerable distance, being literally dyed with their blood. We understand that in length they were from about sixteen to twenty-four feet, the head very large, round, and full, the tail about five feet broad, and, from the description we have heard of them, it would seem that they were of the kind commonly called the Grampus. Between thirty and forty more are said to have been found stranded along the neighbouring coast, about Bannow and the Barrow of Ballytonogue; and it appears, by the following extract from the Wexford Herald of Thursday, that another shoal has been taken still farther eastward beyond Grenore Point:—

“On Monday night, about nine o'clock, thirty-one blunt-headed cachalots, or spermacee whales, ran on shore on Ballygeary strand, near Ballyhire. They were from sixteen to thirty-four feet in length, and were secured by the country people. The head of this fish constitutes nearly one-third of the whole body. The mouth is situated at the under part, and the under jaw is very small in comparison to the upper. The eyes, which are situated above the corners of the mouth, are remarkably minute. The tail is long and slender, and the skin smooth. None of the whale species yield oil of better quality than this, though others produce a greater quantity. Yesterday the blubber was entirely separated from the flesh, which is of a pale red colour, resembling pork! and the prize owners, to whom this unexpected visit must prove a very valuable acquisition, were busily employed in converting it into oil.”
